Holling was a thirteen-year-old boy. He always felt lonely. His father Mr. Hoodhood cared more about his business. They spoke only when it was about school grades.

Everything changed on a rainy Wednesday. While reading a book, Holling found some words. The words touched him. He suddenly realized the father in the story was just like his own dad. That night, Holling knocked on his father's study door. "Dad, can I share something from this book?" Holling took a deep breath and read out loud those words. His voice shook at first, but grew stronger. Then Mr. Hoodhood said slowly, "I didn't know you felt this way, Son. I never meant to leave you alone."

The next Saturday morning, instead of his usual fishing trip, Mr. Hoodhood appeared at Holling's baseball practice. When Holling missed a catch, his father shouted, "The ball will find you next time." After the game, Mr. Hoodhood said, "Good job, Son." Those three words meant more to Holling than winning any game.

That rainy Wednesday taught them both: Brave words start small, and kind listening makes love grow.
